Globalization: Challenges in International Economics & Politics

October 25, 2022

In the course Globalization: Challenges in International Economics & Politics, students work from a multilateral perspective and use case studies to examine the nature of relations between nation-states in a period of increased economic and political integration. Topics include theories of international political economy in relation to foreign aid and sovereign debt, international trade and capital flows, security and non-state actors, rights-based approaches to development and humanitarian emergencies, energy sustainability, and the role of international organizations and financial institutions.

Eva was a student at Columbia University's Pre-College Summer Program in my course Globalization: Challenges in International Economics and Politics. Eva was a motivated student, who approached complex economic and political issues from a myriad of perspectives. She was particularly interested in inequality and climate change. Eva regularly participated in classroom discussions and worked well with her classmates. She was eager to ask questions during guest lectures and was comfortable taking the lead during group activities.

Eva's group project on inequality and globalization was excellent. It was well framed and informative. One of the most impressive aspects of Eva's presentation was the depth of research that she and the group put into it. The quality of the presentation was college level. Eva did an excellent job framing the topic and fielding questions. Her work and effort demonstrated how engaged she was with the material. Eva also pushed her classmates to think about the global political economy from a different perspective. It was a pleasure to have her as a student.

Sincerely,

Raven Brown
